Coaching Philosophy

This is my first year coaching in a competitive league. I have coached 5 out of the 7 years my son has played in rec, and I have had an immense amount of fun watching this group of boys improve year after year. We decided to take that group and form a competition team and see how far we could go. I like to win, but I really just enjoy games where we play well as a team, regardless of the final score.

I'm in favor of boys playing other complimentary sports, enjoying scouting, and having the time to participate in church / family activities. I believe sports are one part of being a well-rounded person, and offer lots of opportunity for teaching important life skills like teamwork, communication, responsibility, hard work, and introspection.

I'm not yet familiar with what tournaments are available, but desire to balance long-distance travel and costs with offering a full experience for the boys. After team formation we can have a meeting to discuss the number / location of tournaments we'd like to enter.

- I plan to charge a small monthly "coaching" fee (around $10) for a few reasons:
1. Equipping this new team (nets, flags, cones, pinnies)
 2. People tend to appreciate things more when they're not just free. I hope that a small fee encourages regular attendance at training.
 3. Holds me accountable. Parents paying a fee will expect a coach to hold regular practices that help their son to continually improve.
 4. Building a pool of funds to use for tournament entry fees or other training opportunities (camps), reducing the need to occasionally ask for additional one-off fees.

I plan to have two training sessions in the weeks leading up to and during the spring and fall seasons, and less regular training and conditioning sessions during the off seasons.
